Pioneering Times

It gives me great pleasure to welcoming you to the first edition of The Gulf Intelligence Oman Energy Forum in Muscat, the sultanate's spectacular capital. As many of you may know, The Gulf Intelligence Middle East Energy Series has become a constant feature in the UAE and Qatar energy landscape in recent years, providing a platform for knowledge exchange between the industry's key stakeholders. Bringing the series to Oman had a simple rationale: to explore and debate the sultanate's increasingly prominent role on the global energy stage.

Oman, in many ways, stands out from its northern Gulf neighbors. It hasn't been blessed with the same sizeable hydrocarbon riches and the ones it does have are complex, fragmented and generally harder to access. But what has been a challenge has also become an opportunity. Today, Oman is rightly being looked at as a pioneer in the application of enhanced oil recovery (EOR) technology. With the help of techniques such as polymer injection, miscible gas injection and steam flooding, the country has managed to reverse years of declining oil production. The sultanate's pioneering spirit is also reflected in the listing of the Oman crude futures contract on Dubai's DME, which aims to become the pricing benchmark for the Asian market.

In an increasingly globalized and interlinked world, Oman also finds itself at the crossroads of old and new trade routes, providing an opportunity to benefit from the emerging south-south energy corridor that will connect Africa, the Middle East and Asia. Tapping into these developments provides an opportunity for Oman to seek greater economic diversification by moving further downstream as part of its in-country-value creation strategy. There can be little doubt that these are pioneering times for Oman and for all of us who are or seek to be part of its ongoing development.
